Reflections

Thoughts For Transformation

The Late Rev. LeRoy Zemke

Freedom Within

Rev. LeRoy Zemke When we let freedom ring, when we let it ring from every range and every state and every city, we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children, black men and white men, jews and gentiles, Protestants and Catholics will be able to join hands and ring in the words of an old negro spiritual, "Free at last, free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last."

Speech at the Lincoln Memorial*

By knowing God one is released from all fetters.

Upanishads, Svetasvatara (Hinduism)

It is dangerous to take human freedom for granted to regard it as a prerogative rather than as an obligation, as an ultimate fact rather than an ultimate goal. It is the beginning of wisdom to be amazed at the fact of our being free.

*Abraham Joshua Heschel
The Insecurity of Freedom Paradigm*

In America, we mark the 4th of July as the date in 1776 when, by the signing of the Bill of Rights, we claimed for ourselves the rights of freedom, liberty, speech, the press, religion and the right to gather together (assembly). These statements became part of our national constitution and of every state in the Union.

Granting freedom by decree or law does not assure it for us, our children or our families or our nation or our world. Freedom is, in a larger context, let alone our communities, an internal state of our nature, our essential or sacred nature. While I believe deeply and profoundly that it is available to us, we have to learn now to express it, to model it, to be an example to those we say are important to us, let alone those with whom we share our lives in business, in professions, in academic, financial, religious and every form of social interaction we know.

As a spiritual quality, I believe freedom is aligned with, or may be connected to our innate power, a very deep inner sense of yearning to share who we are - again at depth. This yearning to be who we are takes on the work of an incarnation.

For example, if we say we wish to become a musician, artist, writer, doctor, dentist, gardener or landscape architect, our training or education will necessarily involve appropriate schooling and life experience to express these yearnings of our soul.

The quality of our work emerges slowly once we may decide on landscape and architecture design. We must quite seriously learn about plants, rock formation, various components of the soil, what may need to be used as materials and a variety of other matters that help us to perform our business or profession.

Information about the kind of plants, studies about nutrients, and how to create a useful as well as sustainable environment is necessary to do the work. There's also the need to learn about community environments, city codes and city requirements.

If we wish to express our freedom to create using plants and natural environments, we must prepare ourselves mentally, emotionally, educationally and spiritually. We must develop a relationship within ourselves that allows us to use our talent(s) wisely. The inner desire for freedom is to reveal our creative nature in a natural environment. We still must operate in the world of form, man made rules and regulations.

Another example illustrative of a soul yearning might be that of a graded school teacher. We love children and we want to be a positive influence in their physical and hopefully spiritual educational development and growth.

We discover that four years of college is required (beyond high school) to prepare to teach. Not only are we learning about content of courses, we must become knowledgeable about our local communities, cities, towns and states. We must learn about what's permitted in the classroom and what and how we must teach our favorite subject be it mathematics or medicine, social justice or physical education (sports).

We may have a deep yearning to inspire, to motivate the young people with our own lives and learning. Yet we must abide by school boards, PTA's, financial agreements and increasing legal ramifications that impact the teacher, the state, the principal and the families of the children we so yearn to serve, to teach, to encourage, to discover themselves

Thus the yearning we have for a noble profession in order to free the minds and hopefully touch the souls of the young is constricted and constrained by the world in which we live.

We ask, “What is the gift of freedom?” The answer is contained in the dilemma of all the conditions and circumstance I spoke about before.

1. Our inner and outer personal nature will shine through the many and varied difficult environments. If we are caring and kind, others will see it and many people, young and old alike will be aware of it. So be caring, kind and as considerate as possible.

2. The outer world in which we all live (in towns and cities and states and nations) is held together by an agreed upon set of guidelines, and yes, some specific rules and regulations. In America we have the “right” to express our speech or to express our form of religion without fear of reprisal. This right then means, in my opinion, that we have to learn how to respect the attitudes and viewpoints of those who think fiercely opposite to us. It means that we can share our ideas without attacking another or becoming angry or becoming intolerant. We know that expressions of anger seemingly justified or not, only leads to more anger. All of us now witness the violence in our world with alarm because we see that it leads to more of the same.

3. A viewpoint is a viewpoint is a viewpoint. It emerges out of a variety of life and cultural contexts such as family, religion, political views, social experience and most of all our own perception and/or interpretations.

While we each feel our viewpoint is correct, nevertheless it is essentially our idea about how to look upon and how to engage in life. I believe it is necessary to remember that viewpoints do not define who we are at depth. How many of us hold the same viewpoint about relationships, parents, our children or our friends that we had as children and in a much broader larger sense, the way the world works? Obviously all of these views have changed.

Certainly this commentary can be continued into many arenas and realms of human activity and human involvement in every aspect of life. The freedom we seek to express, I suspect, is contained in a male body or a female body (or now in a trans-gender body) only as the vehicle through which it is expressed. If I say I love roses or I really love mountain scenery, does that make me “love” only roses? Or a specific mountain? Of course not. My view, internally, is important to me, but it is certainly not who I am.

In a world where multiple views are strong, often intense and conflicted, we may or may not align to those people with whom we would like to share a closer or related viewpoint. But again the viewpoint is not who we are. It can be likened to a shirt we wear and take off. The designer, color, shape is appealing but is only a “cloth covering.”

To develop inner freedom, we must become aware that to truly be who we are is a gradual and perhaps even difficult process. To stand in our truth about matters material, of human interest and expression, is one state of being allowing us certain rights. To become, however, the more awakened soul we entered this life to be, is a major work of an incarnation. It requires courage, conviction and a deep internal willingness to reveal our very heart and soul to ourselves before we are able to reveal it to the world.

We must learn to love those who think exactly opposite to us. We have humanity for the background, but each must have his own individuality and his own thought. Push the sects forward and forward till each man and woman are sects unto themselves. We must learn that differentiation is the life of thought. We have one common goal, and that is the perfection of the human soul, the god within us.

1:00 – 3:00 PM

What if peace is closer than we think?

In this session, we'll explore The Work of Byron Katie — a simple, powerful process of questioning the thoughts that keep us from the freedom and truth within. *Beneath the noise, beyond the race,
Lies a still and sacred place.
No gate, no guard, no lock, no key -
Just breath, and will, and what can be.*

*It does not shout, this inner spark,
It warms the soul when times are dark.
Though storms may rage and roads may bend,
Your truest self will never end.*

*No chain can bind what dares to grow
From seeds of truth you choose to sow.
So speak with grace, and walk your line,
For freedom starts within the mind.*

Affirm:

“I honor the strength within me. I release fear, embrace truth, and choose to walk in freedom—mind clear, heart open, spirit steady.”

*Let it settle into your breath and repeat it
